A financial history of the COVID-19 crisis. In a three part series Paul Wilson takes a long hard look at how and when decisions have been made since 11th March, and weighs up just how effective these have been and at what cost to the economy. Making financial policy on the hoof is fraught with difficulty, as Rishi Sunak has found having had to tear up his plans for the future just weeks after presenting his spring budget.

Financial history is often an area of study, that is over looked. Yet there is so much, that can be applied to our current financial crisis. Ferguson tries to weave together some economic lessons, that can be applied to today's economic situation. I felt the conclusion, which is an overview of the current economic slump, could have gone a ...

2001: Out of the blue, the U.S. Department of the Treasury announces that it will no longer issue 30-year bonds, for years the mainstay of the $18 trillion U.S. bond market. With short-term interest rates much lower than long-term, borrowing for 30 years no longer makes sense to the government. We do not need the 30-year bond to meet the government's current financing needs nor those that we ...
